In mathematics, the four color theorem, or the four color map theorem, states that, given any separation of a plane into contiguous regions, producing a figure called a map, no more than four colors are required to color the regions of the map so that no two adjacent regions have the same color. Adjacent means that two regions share a common boundary curve segment, not merely a corner where three or more regions meet. It was the first major theorem to be proved using a computer. Initially, this

The Problem of the Color [blind] examines this vexed question in American culture by focusing on black performance in theater, film, and television. The practice of colorblind casting—choosing actors without regard to race—assumes a performing body that is somehow race neutral. But where, exactly, is race neutrality located—in the eyes of the spectator, in the body of the performer, in the medium of the performance?
