Discussion of the quality and effectiveness of government activity often emphasizes budgetary factors. When programs fail, the argument goes, it is usually because a good policy was not adequately funded. Doubtless this is sometimes true, but more typically the real causes lie elsewhere—and far deeper.

While it's true that there are plenty of incompetent and ill-intentioned people in government, we can't always blame the people involved. Often, the likelihood of failure is simply built in to the institution of government itself. In other words, politicians and bureaucrats don't succeed because they can't succeed.
